OPEN YOUR MIND AND TASTE

Igneous rock formed from the cooling of molten volcanic lava. Depending on how and where it was formed, the proportion of its mineral content can vary (basalt and andesite are two predominant volcanic components). It also can vary in structure, from more rocky to more silty. These variations can lead to differing styles of wine from volcanic soils in different regions. Overall, these soils tend to be some of the most nutrient rich, and they create wines with strong mineral tones.

Perhaps the mother of all fine wine soil types, and one of the most distinctive as well. It is formed primarily from fossilized seashells high in Calcium Carbonate. It possesses the ability to store water when there is drought, which is essential for vine growth. Its alkaline nature also encourages high acidity in the resulting grapes. Wines from these calcareous vineyards often display an underlying chalky minerality to the aromas, flavors and tannic structure of the wines.

A hard and granular rock with a high content of crystals, particularly quartz, which is formed from magma. Granite tends to be porous and drain very well, forcing roots to go deep to seek water and nutrients. It also tends to be relatively acidic which in turn helps to attenuate the acidity in highly acidic grape varietals. Granite wines are often chunky in structure and show a somewhat iron-like minerality to the underlying wines.

Is a metamorphic rock formed over millions of years from shale or slate under heat and pressure. It tends to hold heat well, so is well adapted for cooler-climate regions. Schist is also comprised of fractured layers of rock, encouraging vines to extend their roots extensively. This encourages wines with a more “powerful” mineral energy, but also a bit rounder than with granite soils.

This is a catch-all heading that includes clay, sand and gravel. These are usually formed by the movement of water over long periods of time. Clay tends to be one of the most water-retentive, while sand and gravel tend to be well-draining. Clay and gravel soils tend to produce wines that are a bit more easy to drink with soft, mineral tannins. Clay-based vineyards tend to yield wines with a bit more structure and also an opulence to the fruit.
